Bajra

Bajra or Pearl millet has been widely grown in Africa and the Indian subcontinent since 2000 BC. It grows in drought-ridden, low soil fertility areas and high temperature areas where other cereal crops, such as maize or wheat, do not survive.

Bajra is approximately 50 per cent of the total world production of millets. India is the largest producer of pearl millet. Over 95 per cent of pearl millet production is used as food and the remainder is animal and poultry feed and for other uses.

Pearl millet looks like brown rice and can be cooked in about 20 minutes after it has been soaked for a couple of hours. In fact, a cup of dry millet expands to three cups of cooked millet that is a fluffy, delicate flavoured dish. Bajra is used to make rotis or the dry flour is added to biscuits bread and roll dough, which gives it a crunchy texture.

Bajra is an important source of energy, protein, vitamins and minerals for millions of poor people. It contains 9% to 13% protein. As it is very high in calories it greatly helps growing children and pregnant women. It is rich in B vitamin, potassium, phosphorus, manganese and low in lectin activity and high in insoluble fibre.

An important feature is that bajra is ideal for people with wheat allergies as it is gluten-free grain and retains its alkaline properties after being cooked. It is astringent and sweet in taste, dry, bowel-binding and light. Bajra can be eaten in all seasons. It is recommended for people with diabetes, oedema and obesity.

Bajra roti is one of the most nutritious staple breads in the Indian cuisine. It is filling and provides huge amounts of energy for strenuous physical work. That is why it is called the farmer's food.
